Though gay-themed stories about "coming out" and accepting one's sexuality are not uncommon in the West, they are still rare in many conservative African nations. Considered a ground-breaking film in its native Guinea, Mohamed Camara's Dakan is the first of its nation's films to directly address issues surrounding homosexuality. The film centers on the romance between two 20-year-old men, Manga and Sory who are first seen making love when Manga tells his widowed mother about his love for Sory, who is busy contending with his outcast status. The two never see each other again. Manga's mother then uses witchcraft to cleanse her son and Sory. Time passes and eventually Manga begins to date a girl. But it soon becomes apparent that try as he might, he cannot get to Sory.
